Neighborhood-Based Supervision: A Review of Promising Practices

Hosted by the National Reentry Resource Center

The practice of neighborhood-based supervision allows parole officers to interact closely with parolees within their social environment, as well as with community organizations and residents, providing them with insight into the parolees' susceptibility to negative influences in the neighborhood. This webinar will provide an overview of the research and current practices of neighborhood-based supervision during the post-release stage of reentry. This webinar will be particularly informative to parole officers in the field who work directly with parolees, field supervisors, community corrections administrators, other justice system personnel, and those working for community organizations with an interest in enhancing successful offender reentry strategies and initiatives.

Date: Wednesday, September 25, 2013
